Hon'ble Vice Chancellor's Message

With the introduction of social media, communication is becoming more and more dynamic every day. As per estimates, now- a- days, platforms like Facebook and Twitter have around 1.18 billion and 316 million active monthly users. YouTube is the 2nd largest search engine and 3rd most visited site on the web. More and more people are joining LinkedIn to create professional networks. And in such a world where online communication is becoming synonymous to social media. It has been proved that social media has found the ability to empower the people.

In agriculture sector, social media is gaining popularity. Professionals are using them to form networks and farmers are taking to social media to talk to peers and consumers. All big things in agriculture – new technology or innovations, seminars and meetings, workshops and trainings, reports, publications - get tweeted. Facebook, Twitter, YouTube, and blogs are the major platforms for agricultural information dissemination. Global online survey carried out by Global Forum for Rural Advisory Services (GFRAS) on use of social media in agricultural extension and advisory services across 60 countries and 226 respondents, Facebook was found to be the most popular social media platform used by Agricultural Extension and Advisory Services (AEAS) sectors.

The major activity on social media was searching for news and events and sharing information. However, democratization of information, voice of the community, user generated content, easy access, extended reach, trust, engagement and community involvement are the main strength of social media, while possibility of translating ideas and information into action, forming of special interest groups, collaboration among various stakeholders, information brokering and fostering innovation and sharing stories are some of the opportunities that help in the growth and development of agriculture.

But inspite of all these rewards, its actual use in rural areas of developing countries like India is still low due to infrastructural facilities and psychological barriers. Also low availability of internet connectivity skill and competence in using social media is lacking. Though national and international organizations are opening up to the prospects of social media, at local level this digital media still faces skepticism because of lack of skills and competency among extension personnel, organizational guidelines, infrastructure, lack of trainings, knowledge management, attitudes towards social media, etc. Training programmes, awareness campaigns, and workshops can help participants in agricultural extension understand and use social media better.

Extension is not just about communicating but bringing behavioral change, thus, mere sharing posts and social media activism is not going to change much without practical actions. A multilevel approach and initiatives at institutional and individual level together is needed to make social media a reality in every sphere of agricultural extension and advisory services as one of the way for doubling the income as a goal.
